This article will guide you through the myth itself, its cultural significance, and how to access and use the PDF materials from WebXMedia to enrich your study.

1. The Foundations of Aztec Cosmology

1.1 The Concept of Time in Mesoamerica

Unlike linear time models, many Mesoamerican cultures viewed time as cyclical. Days, months, and ages repeated in a predictable rhythm, each governed by celestial bodies and divine forces. The Aztecs, inheriting this tradition from earlier civilizations such as the Olmec and Maya, saw the universe as a series of suns—each sun representing a distinct epoch.

1.2 Key Deities Involved in Creation

- Quetzalcoatl – the feathered serpent, god of wisdom and the wind, who initiates the creation process.
- Tezcatlipoca – the night sky, smoking mirror, who challenges Quetzalcoatl and tests humanity.
- Huitzilopochtli – the sun god and patron deity of the Aztec capital, who ultimately becomes the final sun.
- Coatlicue – the earth goddess, mother of gods and humans, who provides the material for creation.

2. The Five Suns: An Overview

2.1 First Sun: The Era of Fire

The first sun, known as Tláloc, burned the world with intense heat. According to legend, the gods created humanity from maize dough, but the people were soon devoured by fire, leading to a brief, scorching age that ended in a great flood.

2.2 Second Sun: The Age of Wind

In the second era, the world was ruled by the wind. Quetzalcoatl, after a series of trials, attempted to create humans from clay. Yet, the wind extinguished the souls of the first humans, and the sun was replaced by a new, cooler sun. This age ended when a great storm destroyed the world.

2.3 Third Sun: The Time of Water

The third sun, Huitzilopochtli, governed an age where water was the primary element. The gods fashioned humans from cacao beans, but the people were drowned by a deluge, leading to the sun's demise.

2.4 Fourth Sun: The Age of Earth

During the fourth sun, the earth was the dominant force. Humans were crafted from maize and earth, but the world was destroyed by a volcanic eruption, signaling the end of this epoch.

2.5 Fifth Sun: The Current Age

The present sun, known as Tonatiuh, is the fifth and final sun. It is sustained by the blood of human sacrifices, a practice that continues to this day in some modern rituals. The Aztecs believed that this sun would eventually be replaced by another, continuing the cosmic cycle.

3. The Role of Quetzalcoatl in the Creation Process

3.1 Quetzalcoatl's Journey to the Underworld

Quetzalcoatl's descent into the underworld was a pivotal event. He sought the copper obsidianthat would grant him the power to create life. With the help of the gods, he returned to the heavens, ready to initiate the creation of humans.

3.2 The Creation of Humanity

Quetzalcoatl mixed maize dough with blood to form the first humans. This act symbolized the union of life (maize) and sacrifice (blood). The gods then tested these humans, leading to the successive suns.

4. Cultural Significance of the Five Suns

4.1 Ritual Practices and Offerings

Each sun's demise was marked by elaborate rituals. Human sacrifices, known as tlacuilo, were performed to appease the gods and ensure the sun's continuation. These offerings were seen as a necessary exchange between humanity and the divine.

4.2 Architectural Reflections

The Aztec pyramids and temples, such as the Templo Mayor, were designed to reflect the cosmic order. The alignment of these structures with celestial events illustrates how the Five Suns influenced architectural planning.

4.3 Influence on Modern Mexican Identity

Today, the myth of the Five Suns remains a powerful symbol in Mexican culture. It appears in literature, art, and national celebrations, reminding Mexicans of their rich heritage and the enduring cycle of renewal.
